My feedback at parents' evenings was always "C+ must try harder...tends to talk a lot" But talking and communication has actually proved to be my strength, not my weakness.

I worked as a qualified nurse until 2002 when I went on to undertake a degree in midwifery. I obtained a First Class Honours and was the only one in my group to do so.

I later left clinical midwifery practice for further study at the University of Hull. I am soon to complete my PhD, which is about the lived experience of women's decision making in childbirth.

I've loved learning and really do think that 'knowledge is power'. I've achieved because I'm passionate about what I feel and I want to make a difference.

If you aim high, you'll achieve high. Recognise your ambitions and grab opportunities with both hands. We all have the capability to make that difference to people's lives and leave our footprint in the world.

The advice I got from my teachers never did me any harm!
